people, I send for their information some items gathered in reference to the St. Louis water supply, which is derived from the Mississippi. The purping engines and settling basins are located near the banks of the river, about three miles above the great bridge, within the corporate limits; and above the point from which the water is drawn is quite a large population, whose waste and exceta are drained into the river. This will necessitate the ultimate removal of the works. Though drawn from the Mississippi, the water is said to come almost entirely from the Missouri, which, though debouching twenty miles above, does not commingle thoroughly for some miles below the city. The water is pumped by three powerful engines, having a capacity of about 35,000,000 gallons per day from the river into four settling basins, each 270 by 600 feet, and covering a total area of nearly fifteen acres, in which the water stands 14 feet deep, and contain about 69,000,000 gallons when full, not quite three days supply, the average daily consumption being 23,758,000 gallons. No method of filtration is adopted but the water stands in the settling basin from fifteen to thirty hours, till the greater part of the mud is precipitated, and is then drawn off into another basin, where it is pumped by two other powerful engines into a tower or stand pipe 240 feet above the high water line of the river, and distributed thence by gravity through the city and also into a storage reservoir on Compton hill, 400 by 800 feet and 23 feet deep, containing 60,000,000 gallons, and held as a reserve in case of accident. There is also a third engine held in reserve and brought into use when repairs are to be made on the others. The deposit of mud in the basins is 140.160 cubic yards a year, or an average of 11½ feet deep, and costs over seven thousand dollars a year to remove it. The basins are cleaned out about once a month. Let those who clamor for Mississippi river water think of all this mud, and remember that at Memphis we have the mud of the Ohio,

The works are owned by the city and i costs annually to operate them $204,134, and the city receives for water rents from customers $613,095 a net progt semi-annually of about $409,000, and yet the charges are not so high as with us.
